AGRICULTURE GUIDE • FALL 2026

Pasture and Forage Minute: Corn Silage Harvest

By Ben Beckman

[<https://epd.unl.edu/profile/bbeckman3>]

Silage harvest for fully irrigated full-season corn usually begins 45 days or 800 GDDs after the tassel/silking growth stage. However, growing conditions and the season length of the plant itself can make predictions based on the calendar fuzzy at best.

Accurately assessing whole plant moisture is key to proper silage pile fermentation and tight packing. If silage is too dry then packing is difficult and may allow oxygen into the pile causing overheating, mold/yeast/bad microbe growth and spoilage. When the silage moisture content is too high, piles can weep with valuable energy and nutrients flowing out as a loss from the pile. Also, damaging clostridia bacteria colonies can grow when silage is too wet. So, target silage storage moisture content should be 65–70% moisture.

Another factor to consider for silage chopping is milk line (a corn kernel starch content indicator). Starch is one of the most energy-dense feed components, so silage that contains higher amounts of starch will be higher energy overall. The further down the kernel milk line is established, the more starch content has been stored in the kernel.

Plant moisture and milk line may not be directly correlated and may vary among hybrids. While these development factors trend in the same direction, the moisture content may vary from field to field, even if milk line is the same.

Corn silage is a great feed resource that can benefit from moisture content monitoring at harvest. Target harvesting silage at 65-70% moisture content for best results. Use the ear kernel milk line (closer to the cob means more starch and higher energy silage) to find your ideal harvest window based on your hybrids.
